

Patient- and Family-Centered Approaches in Transitions from NICU/PICU to Home

Thursday, September 30, 2010

1:00 – 2:30 pm (EDT)

Patient- and family-centered care encourages families to be partners in caregiving and decision-making. Traditionally, planning for the transition to home in newborn and pediatric intensive care settings has been done without significant involvement of the family. In fact, family participation in caregiving may be limited until discharge is imminent. This webinar reviews common practices and processes in NICU/PICU settings and offers strategies to assist clinicians and staff in integrating a patient- and family-centered approach into planning for the transition home.

WEBINAR FACULTY

Marie Abraham, MA, Senior Policy and Program Specialist, Institute for Patient- and Family-Centered Care, provides consultation to health care organizations, develops resources to advance patient- and family-centered care, and serves as co-planner and faculty for Institute training activities. Prior to joining the Institute, she was a developmental specialist working with infants and young children and their families. Since 1998, she has served as a consultant to the Vermont Oxford Network which is dedicated to improving the quality and safety of newborn intensive care.

Terry Griffin, RNC, MS, NNP, is an Advanced Practice Nurse at St. Alexius Medical Center in Hoffman Estates, IL and Rush University Medical Center in Chicago. She has faculty positions at the Graduate College of Nursing at the University of Illinois at Chicago and the Institute for Patient- and Family-Centered Care. Her clinical experience is in the NICU, as a staff nurse, Clinical Nurse Specialist and most recently as a Neonatal Nurse Practitioner. Her area of interest is the relationship among staff, patients, and families. Terry has authored several publications on this topic.

WEBINAR OBJECTIVES

- Describe differences between traditional and patient- and family-centered approaches to planning for transition to home;
- Discuss key elements of successful patient- and family-centered approaches to planning for transition to home; and
